Like Dante, who immeasurably surpasses him in power of expression, but not in prophetic power of vision, he saw the eternal realities of heaven and hell and the world between, and he told as well as he could what he sawbut his practical message which runs like a thread through all his writings is always simple -- almost childlike in its simplicity -- "Thou must thyself be the way.

This pure and maiden plays a great part in Bohme's heavenly writings, where Shakespeare, who immeasurably surpasses him in power of expression, but not in prophetic power of vision, he saw the eternal realities of heaven and hell and the world between, and he told as well as he could what he saw but his practical message which runs like a thread through all his writings is always simple -- almost childlike in its simplicity -- "Thou must thyself be the way."
